To be an Aquino 🎓, Mama Leni 🍲, Manny 🌟, Isko 🖐 and Ping 🚂 supporter is fine too.

You know what's not okay? To be a pa-woke where you need to cancel the people around you who do not support your political stance."

Error in our system:

As for our final result due to the error in our system we received you who as our final list of tweets. This is a critical error since CTK lists in proportion of PRRC's ,that you has the lowest proportion (Figure 1, CTK.). Another error we found is despite the regex we coded to remove “it” or “it’s” preceeds the word ‘who’ by 2-4 words, did not succeed in removing “it’s”.

Result:

Looking at final data of 545 tweets with you who, we have 448 literary tweets (true) using you who and 97 non-literary tweets (false) of you who. This means 80% literary tweets and 20% non-literary tweets consist of our data.

Comparing to the study we are replicating, they had total of filtered 3261 PRRC tweets and they specified 1221 tweets, hence 37% of the tweets are unique/non-literary. The CTK study took a dive to list annotation of the unique tweets, which were restrictive reading, appositive reading, HEAD of RelC, Nominaive, Accusitive, and Role (S,O,P,F).

With limitation of our coding experience we could not extract the detailed specification of the non-literary type. However two things that stood out where that there were lot of “you, who” and “you who” was used a lot in interrogative sentences. Out of 160 tweets list extracted from 545 tweets, 42 tweets, 26% has comma between “you” and “who”. And about 60 tweets, 37% “you who” tweets are used in interrogative sentences.

As our initial reaction to CTK reading we thought that the author’s opinion on how PRRC is robust for contemporary English is exaggerated since PRRC are hard to spot in conversational English. After filtering it ourselves and seeing the tweets with our own eyes, we were able to see and have a better comprehension in how can PRRC function in a non-literary saying in contemporary English. However as CTK result presented with non-literary data as 37% of the filtered tweets, as well as our data (although there are some error in the system) presenting 20% false/non-literary tweets of all the filtered tweets, we believe it is a stretch to describe PRRC function as a robust for contemporary English.
